SO MUCH MORE THAN CONFLICT MANAGEMENT

Organizational challenges no match for the TKI[®] assessment

The Thomas-Kilmann Conflict Mode Instrument (TKI[®]) is the world's best-selling conflict management assessment. It's a valuable tool that helps people understand how different conflict-handling styles affect interpersonal and group dynamics—and how they can choose the appropriate style for any situation.

Watch this entertaining video illustrating four tips for conflict management.

The TKI assessment can also be used for so much more than resolving conflict. For example, this powerful tool helps organizations address challenges such as:

- Improving communication.
- Boosting influence and persuasion capabilities.
- Increasing engagement.
- Retaining employees.
- Reducing overall costs of increasing team efficiency.

Up close and personal

In addition to helping organizations, the TKI framework can also serve as a personal improvement tool to help you:

- Deal with change

Change and conflict are generally a package deal. Using the TKI to understand the different conflict-handling behaviors can help you improve communication, which paves the way for everyone to find solutions, achieve business goals, and decrease stress.

- Work better in teams

Team dynamics are everything in business. The TKI can improve how your team functions by helping members reconcile differences and collaborate more effectively. In addition, the TKI Team Report was designed for consultants and team leaders alike to easily understand team dynamics when it comes to managing conflict.

- Develop your leadership capabilities

By increasing your understanding of difference and expanding your skills in change management and conflict management, you become a better leader.

- Improve your performance

In today's competitive environment, organizations need people who are dedicated to continuous improvement in themselves and others. The TKI helps you identify and eliminate barriers to effective performance and communication.

- Increase self-awareness, manage stress

Learning about your preferred conflict-handling style and how you can use other styles in different situations will have a positive effect on your ability to manage stress.

THREE INDUSTRY TRENDS PERFECT FOR TKI INSIGHTS

Trend #1: Change management— the new reality

Conflict often arises when dealing with change. Change and conflict are a package deal because in times of change, people's perspectives on how the change should be implemented or the results of the change often differ.

In addition, perception of change is different at every level. The CEO may view the change in terms of the bottom line, whereas managers see it in terms of processes and outcomes. Individual contributors may look at the exact same change and only see how it now makes their tasks more difficult, or they may be concerned about workload or job security. Add to that the different ways people handle conflict and it's no wonder their first reaction to change is generally resistance.

“When I was doing a change management project in Barcelona the culture was very conflict averse because, in that country's history prior to 1974, if you spoke up or disagreed with those in government power, you'd be put in jail. And that was in the culture of this organization—people had learned not to speak up,” said Ralph Kilmann, co-author of the Thomas-Kilmann Conflict Mode Instrument (TKI).

“I gave them all the TKI assessment and lo and behold, they came out very high on avoiding and accommodating. Throughout the organization. So, for two years, we had exercises and activities to work through different ways of handling conflict. We talked about what the unwritten rules were. Then we moved to what norms would help the people succeed. These people were hired for their expertise, and knowledge, and you have to share your ideas. What can we do to help everyone feel supported when they speak to better resolve complex issues?”

“Once we were done, you couldn't stop them from talking. I used to joke that it was so quiet when I first got here, now everyone is sharing their ideas and opinions.”

But learning to better manage conflict means that the next time a big change comes around, you'll be better prepared. And less stressed.

The TKI assessment helps organizations address change in many areas, including:

- Employee turnover
- Technology
- Products and marketing
- Customer relationships
- Organizational structure
- Integration
- Mission and strategy
- Culture
- Knowledge
- Policies and processes

Nonprofit managers use TKI to address internal changes and challenges

Trend #2: Employee engagement— no longer just a “nice to have”

Every year companies spend billions of dollars to keep their employees engaged—for good reason. When employees are engaged, challenged, and meeting their growth goals, they are more committed to the organization’s success and less likely to resign.

Retaining employees is important because a high turnover rate results in lower productivity, overworked staff, and loss of institutional knowledge. Plus, there’s the high cost of recruiting, interviewing, and training—some estimates are as high as 150% of the employee’s annual salary and up to 300% of an executive’s annual salary.

Employee engagement also has a dramatic impact on an organization's overall performance. One study examining the relationship between employee engagement and organizational performance found that there's a strong correlation between employee engagement and customer loyalty, productivity and profitability, employee turnover, employee and customer safety, absenteeism, loss, and disability. (Harter et al., 2013).

Despite these overwhelming benefits of engagement, Gallup research found that of the 100 million people in America in full-time jobs:

- 34% of employees are engaged and inspired at work.
- 16% of employees are actively disengaged and actively spread discontent.
- The remaining 50% are not engaged.

The TKI can help organizations engage employees by helping them deal with conflict. The tool is used to assess an employee's typical behavior in conflict situations and provide detailed information about how to effectively use five different conflict-handling modes, or styles. Equipped with this information, employees become less stressed, more inspired, and inevitably more engaged.

Trend #3: Conflict is perceived negatively

“ To engage in productive conflict has ONE purpose—to produce the best possible solution in shortest period of time. Healthy conflict is a time saver. ”

Patrick Lencioni, business author and speaker

Why does seeing conflict positively matter? Because conflict is crucial for a team’s development, performance, and health. If you define conflict simply as when two or more ideas aren’t in alignment, then conflict becomes the starting point for creativity and striving for a best solution. Without conflict, teams would stagnate.

However, our recent research report (Conflict at Work) shows many individuals still view conflict negatively:

- 52% had a mixed response to 'Is conflict positive or negative?'
- 31% said that conflict always or generally gave negative results.
- Men were more likely to see conflict positively than women. 14% of men mentioned feeling 'excited, energized, or challenged' by conflict, but only 4% of women did.
- People with a preference for Extraversion saw themselves as significantly better at managing conflict than people with a preference for Introversion.

What happens when teams lack the capacity for healthy conflict?

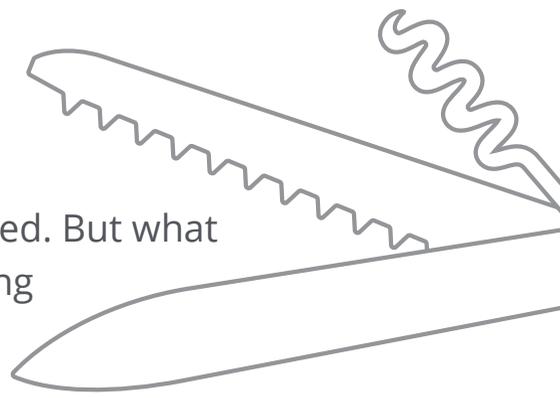

Stuck at storming

In Bruce Tuckman's model of team development, there are four stages: Forming, Storming, Performing and Norming.

Stage one (Forming) describes the typical behaviors of a new group or team as they come together. People start to find their place, tend to perform individually, are probably overpolite, and are perhaps a little unsure or unclear of their roles.

Stage two (Storming) describes the challenges and stormier relations that emerge when team members move past the cautious participation of the Forming stage. Storming is when team members start to express views and opinions more readily. It's also where conflict is likely to appear first.

In Tuckman's model, Performing is conditional on Storming being resolved. But what makes teams get stuck in the Storming stage? One reason is not being able to resolve conflicts.

The quote on page 12 comes from Patrick Lencioni, author of the best-selling book The Five Dysfunctions of a Team: A Leadership Fable.

In his model, an effective team fully understands and overcomes the five dysfunctions of a team. To meet its potential and truly behave like a team, all five dysfunctions need to be overcome.

Absence of trust

The first dysfunction is absence of trust. In Lencioni's view, trust is the bedrock for all teams. Having trust means team members can be vulnerable with each other, knowing that those vulnerabilities won't be used against them.

Without trust, there is no team.

The next dysfunction—the second dysfunction of a team—is fear of conflict.

Fear of conflict

The fact that fear of conflict appears so early in this model shows how fundamental it is to team success. Fear of conflict will tend towards absence of conflict. Lencioni also describes this dysfunction as artificial harmony.

Teams with this quality will:

- Have boring meetings.
- Create environments where back-channel politics and personal attacks thrive.
- Ignore controversial topics that are critical to team success.
- Fail to tap into all the opinions and perspectives of team members.
- Waste time and energy with posturing and interpersonal risk management.

This has a direct impact on the third dysfunction of a team, which is lack of commitment. A team that collectively agrees but individually or privately disagrees with the team's decision simply cannot commit to it. At least, not with any authenticity.

Groupthink

Groupthink might sound like one of George Orwell's Newspeak words from his dystopian novel 1984, but it was popularized by Irving Janis, a social psychologist, in the early 1970s.

The more a team or group of people is similar, friendly, and familiar with each other, the less likely they are to challenge each other. This is the essence of groupthink, and it refers specifically to decision-making.

In this situation, agreement gives the impression of everyone being on the same page. And, on one level, they are—but for the wrong reason.

Agreement hasn't been reached through critical discourse or exploring different perspectives. It's been reached because preserving interpersonal harmony is the priority, not the work-related interests and objectives of the team.

Speaking up

If groupthink sounds too sinister a concept for office workers, what about simply speaking up?

Dr. Gail Fann Thomas, in The Myers-Briggs Company podcast episode on conflict management, says, "There's been a lot of really good research lately about people not speaking up, and there can be a lot of reasons why people don't speak up. I do a lot of coaching with helping people speak up, or coaching with senior leaders who created some kind of an atmosphere that people don't want to speak up because they're so strong and competing, or they've got such strong ideas that no one's going to bother."

And, if no-one's speaking up, we can be fairly sure there's no listening going on either. At least, not the deep, active listening that builds trust.

No conflict on the team?

Should we beware the team that looks too good to be true?

While it seems contradictory to learn conflict management skills when there is no conflict, it could also be exactly the right reason for gaining skills. The above examples show the flipside of harmony and the potential consequences of effortless consensus on team health. They help team members see that conflict really does have value.

And if conflict has a place in a well-functioning team, conflict management skills do too.

Telecommunications company uses TKI for team building, leadership development

“ We use the TKI in either team settings or leadership development settings. It’s fun and interesting for the participants, and they learn a fairly simple model that they can remember after the training. People still use the language after the training, so I know they are retaining some valuable knowledge. It’s mostly beneficial for knowing about the different approaches to conflict. Then afterward you can help people develop skills. ”
